

Dear Friend,

2014 was a pivotal year for the Forward, a year of strategic thinking, research, design and planning that reaffirmed our unwavering commitment to both serve and reflect a diverse American Jewish community – with unflagging journalistic excellence, provocative cultural exploration and lively Yiddishkeit. At the same time, it resulted in bold changes that will help us deliver on that commitment for generations to come.

In some ways, the year began for us the previous October with the Pew Research Center's groundbreaking "Portrait of Jewish Americans." Our insightful coverage of the report and its implications showed exactly what readers expect from the Forward. Beyond that, it prompted us to carefully consider how the Forward itself should respond to Pew's findings, how our journalism could remain relevant and essential to generations of American Jews whose experiences and challenges are quite different from our parents' and even our own. >>

We engaged readers, staff and contributors, Forward Association members and outside experts to reflect on our legacy and mission, and to examine how people use and interact with media today. Together, we conceived a new Forward, more effective at connecting Americans of all ages and affiliations (even if that is no affiliation) with their Jewishness, while continuing to fearlessly scrutinize those who represent and claim to represent us as a community.

While the most visible changes – our bold new logo, redesigned website, and reimagined newspaper – wouldn't be unveiled until early 2015, the ideas behind them increasingly informed our work in 2014. More distinct voices and deeply personal narratives appeared in our pages, like Josh Nathan-Kazis's account of his quest for Spanish citizenship based on his Sephardic heritage, and Tuvia Tenenbom's chronicles of Jewish life in all its absurdity. We launched new features to address the challenge of finding meaning and community, and the aspiration to live in a way that reflects our Jewish history, values and tastes: The Seesaw, a contemporary twist on the Forward's beloved Bintl Brief, offering advice for navigating interfaith relationships, and Wondering Jew, exploring the range of rituals and meaning American Jews find in the annual cycle of holidays.

At the same time, we continued to set the gold standard of Jewish journalism, with unmatched reporting of the Gaza War and its human toll on both sides of the border; enlightening political and diplomatic analysis from editor-at-large J.J. Goldberg; unflinching coverage of dangerous circumcision practices, far-flung Jewish communities and insular Hasidic enclaves; diverse views of culture both controversial and inspirational, from "The Death of Klinghoffer" to a celebration of Leonard Cohen; and vibrant conversations, commentary and videos sustaining the mameloshn in the Forverts newspaper and to a growing audience on yiddish.forward.com.

All this was made possible by the financial support of our members. The Forward is a nonprofit, public media organization; it remains truly independent, un beholden to powerful individuals or institutions, only because it can rely on those, like you, who cherish a uniquely welcoming home for our many Jewish voices.

The Forward made unprecedented investments in 2014 to expand our coverage, improve our products and engage new readers. We thank you for your donations, which made those investments possible, and hope you will invest with us to sustain these efforts and ensure the Forward's future.

Warm regards,

JACOB MOROWITZ
Chair of the Board

Thank You

The Forward Association gratefully acknowledges the individuals and organizations listed below and later in this report, whose gifts made between January 1 and December 31, 2014, helped sustain the Forward as a vibrant, independent Jewish media organization for readers today and for future generations.
